

Assuming these incidents to occur as a Poisson process in time, follow the test procedures of Example 8.12 to explore whether there has indeed been a significant increase in the underlying accident rate over the intervening period. [7]

(Notice that it is not necessary to know the individual monthly accident counts in order to perform the test. In your analysis, it is all right to assume that all months are of equal duration.)